

EDITOR'S NOTE

As facilitator of Women in Philosophy for the last two years, it has been my privilege to take part in the on-going dialogue that characterizes this remarkable group. The academic year 2002-2003 brought several challenges that enabled discussions of our identity and purpose. It is my hope that the growth and self-questioning we began together this year will continue throughout years to come. So long as there is a place for philosophy, there is a place for women in philosophy. It is important to keep drawing and reinventing the borders of that space.

I would like to thank all of the women who participated in Women in Philosophy throughout the year. I would especially like to thank Professor Claudia Baracchi for her tireless and inspiring support of this group; Katie Terezakis, for repeatedly opening her home to our meetings; Sonja Tanner, for delivering her paper at our first department-wide meeting; Rocio Zambrana, for taking over the position of facilitator for 2003-04; and the Graduate Faculty Philosophy Department at New School University for its support of the group and for providing us with so many reasons and occasions to come together.
